WEATHER SYNOPSIS BY REGION

NORTHERN CALIFORNIA

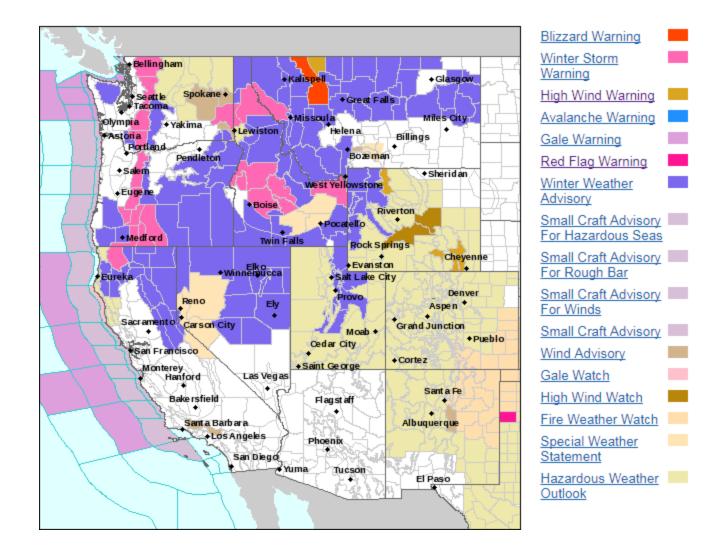

Below normal temperatures will continue. Additional systems this week will bring more widespread precipitation. The first system, with very low snow levels, will move into the region tonight and Monday. Clear skies and milder temperatures (but still cold) across the region early this morning. Current readings range from the single digits to teens in the mountain valleys to the 30s and lower 40s in the Central Valley.

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA

Winds will be breezy through early Sunday along the Central Coast and portions of Ventura and Los Angeles Counties. After another night of very cold temperatures in wind sheltered areas, afternoon temperatures will be near normal on Sunday then cool to below normal through the work week. Breezy winds and a chance of light precipitation return to the region Monday and Tuesday then again Thursday through Saturday. Snow levels will be at or below some passes at times this week.
